FROM THE RECTOR

In praise of Charm City's restaurants

Crossing the Williamsburg Bridge, which links Brooklyn to the island of Manhattan, required a certain intestinal fortitude back in the early 1980s. Years of deferred maintenance had taken their toll on what was (and, thankfully, still is) an engineering marvel.

Motorists trapped on the bridge by traffic snarl ups on Houston Street had the opportunity to study its corroded grey girders, punctuated at irregular intervals by holes testifying to missing rivets. And, as the structure heaved and swayed under its burden of throbbing V-8s, one could readily picture a myriad of other rivets working themselves loose.

But if crossing the Williamsburg Bridge to Manhattan could be a bane, it could also be a blessing. Shortly after it debouched on to Houston Street there stood a delicatessen that sold the best corned beef sandwiches that have ever passed my lips.

Its customers were drawn from across the social spectrum. Orthodox Jews from the diamond district, Wall Street types, blue collar workers and cops rubbed shoulders with the occasional denizen of the Bowery, which was just up the road.

I've had many an interesting experience at that deli – and not solely of the gastronomic variety. One day, for example, when standing in line for a sandwich, the sirens of what sounded like half a dozen police cruisers howled outside.

Moments later Houston Street was crawling with New York's Finest. It was hard at first to make out their quarry. It turned out to be a little old guy in a wheel chair. 'What's he done?' we asked as they bundled him into the back of a squad car.

'He just knocked over the bank round the corner,' came the reply, 'He made his getaway in the wheel chair. He had the money in a bag on his lap. That's chutzpah for you!'

When the little old guy arrived in court for his arraignment, he told the judge he had been released that morning from New York's notorious Rikers Island prison.

'I've been in jail most of my life,' he explained, 'I've got no family. I've got nowhere to go. I didn't want to hurt anybody. I just wanted to go home.' The judge granted his wish. He had no choice. Armed robbery even by an old guy in a wheel chair is a serious felony.

(This sad story is a reminder of how important resources such as At Jacob's Well are to the homeless mentally ill, many of whom have endured long periods of incarceration for lack of treatment facilities and a decent place to live.)

Back to the business of delicatessens: The only other places in the world where the delicatessens equal New York's are Germany and Austria. But this really should be no surprise because many of New York's greatest delis were started by German Jews who were fleeing Nazi persecution.

Indeed, the name 'delicatessen' is derived from the German Delikatessenhandlung or shop that sells delicacies. A more modern German name for a deli is Feinkostgeschäft.

Be that as it may, on coming here more than 25 years ago, I didn't miss much about New York. Sure the theatres, concert halls, the incomparable 'Met' and the restaurants were wonderful, but mostly they were beyond the means of earthlings like mere parish priests and their families.

It was easy to bid adieu to the grime, the crime and the men with squeegee bottles who held motorists to ransom by threatening to smear up their windshields with their filthy polishing rags.

(Mayor Guiliani straightened up the city in this regard, but, from what I read about Mayor de Blasio, the squeegee men might well be soon be putting in a return appearance. What goes around comes around, they say.)

And it was no hardship to say farewell to New York's high cost of living that was in large part a consequence of extortionately high taxes. Even Maryland's excessive taxes seemed a bargain in comparison.

New York, thus, was a tough place to live for the ordinary family, and we found Baltimore infinitely more liveable . . . with four major exceptions – Chinese restaurants, Indian restaurants, Middle Eastern restaurants and, of course, delicatessens.

Sad to say, we have never found a Chinese restaurant in Baltimore that equals the ones we patronised in New York. But then I worked only a couple of block south of China town so that was only to be expected.

When we arrived here however, it was impossible to find an Indian restaurant that measured up those on Second Avenue in the neighbourhood of Bellevue Hospital or out in suburban Long Island.

That lack has now been remedied with the opening of Café Spice on York Road, just north of Warren Road. Unlikely though it seems, Cockeysville plays host to what without exaggeration can be described as one of the finest Indian restaurants on the Eastern Seaboard, if not the country.

Try its lunchtime buffet. It is exceptional. And, for dinner, its Lamb Madras curry (one of my favourites) is, like all of its curries, perfectly balanced. If you like something tasty but on the mild side, try a Korma.

When it comes to Middle Eastern food, it's hard to beat Lebanese cuisine, reputedly the region's best. And the Lebanese Taverna on President Street, Baltimore, not far from the Polish Memorial, is as good as any you'll find in New York.

And just couple of weeks ago Charlotte and I discovered a corn beef sandwich as good as the one on the menu at my Houston Street deli. You'll find it, too, in a modest little establishment on Cranbrook Road called the Corned Beef Factory. And if you favour a Reuben sandwich, they make one to die for.

In short, restaurantwise, life here in Timonium is near perfect. After all, it's probably asking just a bit too much to expect to come across a Chinese restaurant as good as the ones in New York's Chinatown. But one lives in hope... GPH✳
