FROM THE RECTOR

Veterans Day reflections on War and Remembrance

A century has passed since the First World War began and 60 years since the Second World War ended, yet they are still the most important formative events in world history.

None who lived through them were untouched by them. Indeed, they influenced and informed our thinking, even in the most mundane spheres of our existence.

It is sad, for example, that our children and grandchildren idolise mere paper heroes. Small wonder so many young people run off the rails when all they are offered to admire are the tawdry images projected by the public relations machines that manipulate vacuous pop-singers and movie stars.

Once upon a time, children looked up to real flesh-and-blood heroes. They were the soldiers, sailors and flyers who had put their lives on the line – and all too often lost them – in the service of humanity.

Some of them were household names (like Ike, Bradley, Patton, Monty and Churchill), but most were just plain folks – mothers and fathers, uncles and aunts, sisters and brothers, the folks next door.

What made these ordinary people so admirable were the extraordinary things they had done for their fellow men. And, though it might sound naïve in this cynical age of ours, these "ordinary" heroes set the standard by which children judged others . . . even singers and movie stars.

Audie Murphy was one of Hollywood's great box draws. Modest, unassuming and strikingly good looking, his deficiencies as an actor were more than offset by the fact that he was the most decorated soldier of World War II.

Audie Murphy provided a role model that parents could heartily commend to their children and their kids could accept without feeling that there was something priggish or wimpy about him. He was the type that most young men hoped to emulate and most young women would have been happy to date.

The movie-going public watched with approval as major stars – Jimmy Stewart, Clark Gable, David Niven, Bob Cummings to name but four – interrupted their careers to answer their country's call.

In the immediate post war period, pop stars who attempted to evade the draft saw their careers go into permanent eclipse.

Back in the '40s and '50s, 'service to the nation' was understood to be one of the highest possible callings, rather simply an opportunity to reap the highest possible return.

The self-absorbed Sixties, of course, changed all that – by no means entirely for the better. Indeed, society is considerably the poorer because of its loss.

Today it is common to encounter arguments that the Allies often resorted to tactics as evil and unscrupulous as those of the enemy.

A British television drama, for example, portrays the country's intelligence services sending an innocent man with a German name to the gallows in order to protect a mass-murderer who happens to be a gifted code breaker.

One can never be entirely sure that such shameful events did not occur. But one can say that had they done so in any great number, such is that nature of our free and open society, they would certainly have come to light as some point during the past 70 years.

It is difficult to say what purpose such exercises in moral equivalence are intended to serve.

Could it be that the narcissistic, self-anointed solons of the entertainment world genuinely see a parallel between the governments of the liberty-loving West and the totalitarian dictatorships responsible for the imprisonment, torture and murder of millions upon millions of people under their sway?

Whatever the motive for such thinking, it is, I guess, the price we pay for free expression – which, paradoxically perhaps, is one of the freedoms those who died in the two World Wars gave their lives to preserve.

Be that as it may, on Veterans Day, society reflects upon the debt it owes to those who answered the country's call and the enormity of the sacrifice of those who never came back.

But in recalling their names, we might also pause to reflect on just what it was they died for. Keeping their vision fresh in the eyes of future generations is the most sincere tribute we can pay them. GPH
